Equipment operators and other reclamation personnel, however, would be exposed to safety hazards during excavation. Exposure to elevated temperatures and noxious gases and steam would continue until completion of excavating and cooling activities. Moderate short-term beneficial impacts could occur from the recovery of extractable mineral resources after the fire is extinguished. Where local residents would be displaced to excavate fires and where buildings and other structures would be moved or demolished, the impacts could be locally significant. (See section 4. 2. 2. 2.) The postreclamation backfill area is not generally suitable for home or other construction purposes; however, most other land uses can be restored after fires are extinguished. Resulting beneficial impacts include broadening the postmining land uses and eliminating the potential for property destruction and the loss of valuable natural resources from forest fires ignited by coal mine fires. These benefits are significant and long term. (See section 4....
