It is not only the most populous state and fastest growing economy, but also home to the largest Internet community in the world. Today, China's population consists of more than 457 million Internet users who work with the World Wide Web in lots of different ways. As in many other countries, 'Social Media' has become a crucial aspect of China's everyday Internet and business life. Still, this use of 'Social Media' cannot be taken for granted considering the strong governmental control over citizens' personal lives a couple of decades ago, and in some aspects its characteristics and terms of use differ from the rest of the world. In this essay, I first want to present the development of China's (digital) communication in order to provide a better understanding of former and current aspects of media in general. Then, I will have a closer look at the characteristics of 'Social Media' in China. This chapter will include a rough definition of the term 'Social Media' to avoid misinterpretation. Finally, I will deal with economic aspects by explaining so-called 'Social Business' in China. 16 pp. Englisch.
